WEDNESDAY APRIL 21, 1875

AN EXPOSURE OF DUPLICITY

Si ce the appearance of the pretentious and very insolent Open Letter addressed by the editor of the Commercial to Rev Dr Field we have refrained from all comment on the subject, not, however from any lack of indignation at its absolute character or any fail ce to penetrate the ingenious of plans skillfully under which the writer of that document sought to cover his design. The Senator has one thanks for official documents of interest.

The Milwaukee Notes If married men will attend the spelling matches they had better leave their wives at home It isn't comfortable to walk home with her and the dear creature muttering at every step. I'm ashamed of your ignorance and If you can't spell aglinte I'll teach you when I get home Nothing disheartening.

The Vicksburg (Miss) correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial, Dem writes to his paper the annexed city Intelligence that the condition of that city since it came into Democratic hands has been worse than when under Republican rule Little Jolly he no doubt that the electoral vote of Louisiana will be counted for Tilden

Open Letter Tshould not have thought it worth while to make these statements but for the fact that the Democrats are trying to create the impression that one of the first acts of the new Board of Aldermen was to repudiate nearly 8000 000 of the city bonds for the payment of laborers and other servants of the city, notes or warrants were issued and after about $600 000 had been paid out no right to obtain from the Circuit Court that the notes were illegal and the Attorney General publicly declared that so the Mayor and Council and the senate to have done this declaration of illegality saved a great deal of suffering extortion and the holders of the notes received this is an illustration of what Democrat reform government means

The ninth annual encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic will assemble at Chicago on the 19 of May And every active committee headed by Gen Sheridan is arranging a grand military reunion of the soldiers of the Northwest to be a permanent in the country to be held

At the great celebration in Concert Hall Monday in honor of the birthday of Lincoln it was followed by a grand banquet read for fourteen hundred people Speeches were stirring and inspiring Letters were read from Senator Morrill Governor Chamberlain Hon Hannibal Hamlin Hon Thomas B Reed Hon Ralph Waldo Emerson and Hon J R Hawley President of the United States Centennial Commission Gov Dingley of Maine and staff and Gov Ingersoll of Connecticut and distinguished guests at tables Gen Leroy Moore presiding Hon Thomas Brackett Reed delivered an address Gen Hawley and Gen Ingersoll of Connecticut and Hon Thos C Platt were the speakers with rousing cheers and the first speaker

The Republican of the United States has left Washington for the Kentucky Lexington but we have the pleasure to have with us a gentleman who was Third Auditor to old Cyndi Whos Tim Pendleton who was a Sub Auditor to pay back Gold bond shebeen Greenback and for giving her Redpoll a kick (Applause) Tim Pendleton was a National Democrat and a right to speak for the people of the United States and to be called an Independent Democrat Tim comes from Indiana (Cheers) Tim Pendleton (Long applause)

In Illinois Legislature report to adjourn without fixing a time to limit the Illinois Railroad, for compulsory education

PERSONAL—The Kennebec Journal regrets to learn that Senator Morrill is sick at Washington, and will probably be unable to come home for some time As chairman of the Appropriation committee his duties have been very arduous, and they have told upon his health and strength The Senator has our thanks for official documents of interest.

A CARD FROM REV DR. FIELD

BANGOR Apr 19 1875

To the Editors of the Whig and Courier

While I do not think it worth my while to take any further notice of those wilfully misleading and misrepresentations of my Crusade sermon which appeared in the Boston Herald and was written by Mr Emery Perhaps the copy of that report which I have given in this to knowledge of my ministerial duty enable you to perceive a better to understand the bitterness of my Norombega remarks and also to see through the malignant misrepresentations of that carefully dishonest production called an "Open Letter" I should not have thought it worth while to make these statements but for the fact that some of my friends who live at a distance and do not know the character and standing of the editor of the Commercial too readily believe that this city I have thought it a merciful act of the kind you did stumble

DOMESTIC NEWS.

WASHINGTON.

Frauds in the Indian Service—The Tribune Charges Secretary Delano with Complicity

New York April 20 The Tribune's Washington special says by the investigation of the doings of the Indian ring in the Interior department, the corruption has at last been traced within the bosom of the Secretary's family. Papers which establish the fact beyond a question are in the hands of the President and an intimation that Delano's resignation will be accepted by the President has been already conveyed to the Secretary. He probably owes his place only to the personal friendship of John Delano, and need not be longer looked on as one only associated with the corruptions and frauds in the Indian Service. No one familiar with the character of Delano believes his father innocent of knowledge or complicity in the outrageous practices that have been going on in the Indian service and in other branches of the department. It is not improbable that Mr Smith, Solicitor of the Interior Department, nor Mr Smith, Commissioner of Indian Affairs will be removed from office.

The Report Discredited

WASHINGTON April 20 Gen Cowen Assistant Secretary of the Interior and other prominent officials of the Interior Department discredit the report that the Interior has requested Secretary Delano to resign. They say they have heard nothing whatever of the matter, and consider it very improbable in view of the fact that the President and Delano are now travelling together for pleasure. Of the other charges in the Tribune's West Indian report they do not know but in the absence of the President they cannot now be officially called on for a decision.

Called Bonds

The returns of the Treasury to-day show that for the millions of the twenty bonds which the Secretary has instructed Assistant Treasurers throughout the country to forward to Washington for payment May interest without rebate. The bonds called in represent on bonds and are included within the following numbers Coupons from 15 to 17 1 0 10 from 13 001 to 14,000 30 from 1 001 to 22 100 1 000s, from 6 1 0 0

A bloody fight ensued which lasted for several hours ten soldiers being killed and all the soldiers engaged in the disturbance killed or wounded.

THE BROOKLYN TRIAL

A CROWDED COURT ROOM TUESDAY.

THE POINTS CONSIDERED.

Opening of the Court Tuesday Morning.

BROOKLYN, April 20 Judge Neilson came to insure the orderly seating of the audience and prevent over crowding. Among the earliest arrivals were Tilton and two friends and his Counsel Fullerton. There were about twenty females in Court Beecher his wife, daughter, brother in-law and O. C. Bullard entered together, the latter carrying a little bouquet in his left hand and a book under his arm. When he took off his overcoat it was noticed that he had strapped over his shoulder a travelling satchel.

Still Dwelling on the Term 'Charge'

The Cross-examination was resumed at 11 o'clock. The witness was asked whether after a night's reflection he was able to regard Tilton as having charged him on the 30th of Dec with improper advances. He was not able so to do. He regarded Tilton's mentioning that his wife had made such statements and then read it or if he had to give the narrative over again would give it in the same form. But it was not true in strict sense that Tilton himself made the charge. Counsel read the witness direct testimony on this point and asked him if it was not his ordinary signification of the words. Witness stated he was again called to his letter to his pastor Perkins saying Tilton had withdrawn the charges he had repeated against him. He said this referred to Bowen's charges repeated by Tilton and there was no intention to go into Mrs Tilton's charges. Counsel have read from Beecher's direct testimony. Moreover from Tilton's anger and fury I felt the charge as made, by him and supported by written declarations of his wife. I was at once to be pressed against me and I was asked what did my mouth say charge. Witness said he then used the word charge in a general sense of or declar or make known but not in the precise sense in which Counsel now speaks.

Tilton's True Story

The Ragged Edge letter was next taken up and his expressions explained. Witness had already done on the direct examination. Witness continued. It was about December, 187. He was call upon to hear Tilton's True Story read. He was after the publication of the Woodhull scandal. Tilton said, he be reading it. Then he commenced. If you can stand this you can stand the whole of it. I said so the witness thought himself when he heard it.

The letter was here read by counsel, meeting Beecher of having asked Mrs Tilton to be a wife to him, with all that it implied.

Q—Now, Mr Beecher, is that a correct statement of what was read?

A—It is correct.

Q—Now Mr Beecher, when that accusation was read to you why did not you stop it and deny the charge?

A—Mr Fullerton, that is not my manner of dealing with men and things.

Fullerton—I perceive that, and we will pass on.

Witness said to produce the card for publication which he drew up with the assent of Mr Tilton. He could not produce it. He had it when he made his long statement to the committee.

Counsel read from the statement "Well I accepted it, and the original I have found many times."

Witness said I probably he then had it, he has not looked for it very lately.

Mrs Moulton's Statements Considered.

Saturday when he called on Mrs Moulton he was in indignation and denounced Tilton a treachery and rottenness in pretending to keep the thing secret while wishing some body to bring it out so that he would pay it to be the sufferer. Witness did not think it on the sofa or anything. But he was down on Moulton. How he could be down on the sofa while talking for Moulton and as he can never lie down without having his feet covered place he had the hay seed, Mrs Moulton called to throw something over him. He distinctly remembers he was not lying on the sofa during the visit. Mrs Moulton spoke of her husband's deafness. Hearing, Mrs Moulton's testimony that she blessed him. He has the impression that he suggested the question to Tilton's counsel and upon it or words to the ordinary signification of words. He only regarded the word charge in the ordinary signification of the term. Witness attention was again called to his letter to his pastor Perkins saying Tilton had withdrawn the charges he had repeated against him. He said this referred to Bowen's charges repeated by Tilton and there was no intention to go into Mrs Tilton's charges. Counsel have read from Beecher's direct testimony. Moreover from Tilton's anger and fury I felt the charge as made, by him and supported by written declarations of his wife. I was at once to be pressed against me and I was asked what did my mouth say charge. Witness said he then used the word charge in a general sense of or declar or make known but not in the precise sense in which Counsel now speaks.

Tilton's True Story

He was call upon to hear Tilton's True Story read. He was after the publication of the Woodhull scandal. Tilton said, he be reading it.

RELIGION AND DOUTRINE.

BY JOHN HAY.

He stood before the Sanhedrim;
The scowling rabbis gazed at him.
He reeked not of their praise or blame;
There was no fear, there was no shame
For one upon whose dazzled eyes
The whole world pomped its vast surprise.
The upper heaven was far too near,
His first day's light too sweet and clear,
To let him waste his new-gained ken
On the hate-clouded face of men.

But all they questioned, Who art thou?
What hast thou been? What art thou now?
Thou art not he who yesterday
Sat here and begged beside the way.
—And I am he,
Nor I was blind, but now I see.

He told the story o'er and o'er,
It was his full heart's only lore,
A prophet on the Sabbath day
Had touched his sightless eyes with clay,
And made him see who had been blind.
Their words passed by him like the wind
Which sways and bows, but cannot shake
The hundred fathom-footed rock.

Their threats and fury all went wide,
They could not touch his Hebrew pride.
Their sneers at Jesus and his band,
Nomads and heretics in the land,
Their boasts of Moses and his Lord,
All could not change him by one word.

Centuries not what this man may be,
Sinner or saint, makes for me.
One thing I know, that I am he
Who once was blind, but now I see.

They were all doctors of renown,
The great men of a famous town;
With deep brows wrinkled, broad and wise,
Beneath their wide phylacteries,
The wisdom of the East was theirs,
A hundred crowns their silver hairs
The man they jeered and laughed to scorn
Was unlettered, poor, and humbly born
But he knew better for that they
What once to him had happened, they,
As I what the Christ had done for him
He knew and they the Sanhedrim.

NOBODY BUT JANE ROSSITUR.

To be, as he was, more than half in love with Marjorie was only to share the condition of a dozen other young gentlemen of his own age and tastes. The only wonder was that he was not wholly in love with her, the young men who were wholly in love with her being so greatly in the majority. It was so natural—indeed, so unavoidable—that Marjorie should be the idol and admiration, that swarm without number should sigh at her little feet, that she should be praised for almost every thing she did or said, that every woman should like her, though she was such a formidable rival. General admiration was the gift her fairy godmother had certainly bestowed upon her in her baptism, whereto she had been made the prettiest, the most charming, the most fortunate, of young maidens. As to her being fortunate, she had always been favored by fortune. Her life had scarcely known a cloud. She had been born a beauty; she had been born an heiress—a sort of princess, indeed; she had been the only child, with no younger or elder sisters or brothers to divide her triumphs for the affections showered upon her. Then, again, she had inherited a grandmother, a positive fairy of a grandmother, rich, generous, affectionate—a grandmother who had been a beauty herself, and who adored the girl for reproducing her own charms, springing from the admiration of her own best youth, consoling, graceful, graceful phenix. Grandmamma Marchmont had, in fact, taken possession of Marjorie from her earliest years. She had controlled her education, chosen her companions, selected her dresses and fingers indeed, had made her her chief object in life. When she had not been with her child at her parents' home, she had been enjoying her at her own delightful house. The one establishment had been as much home to Marjorie as the other.

So it was quite to be expected that having regulated all else appertaining to her, she should make up her mind to regulate the most important event of her existance. It was nothing more than natural that she should look round among the lovers, and, after mature deliberation, decide that though all were well enough in their way, the prince for her princess was not among them.

"When Marjorie is married," she said to herself, with dignity, she must not only be married but match. There must be no inequalities."

But she was far too gracious and lofty minded lady to be afraid in a hurry about the matter. There was not an atom of vulgar haste about her. Meanwhile the lovers came and go, and gave hopes of and Marjorie time. She looked about gravely still, and even while weighing each suitor in the balance and finding many wanting, would rather have perished in unrapaid satisfiness than have slighted the least among them.

It was not until Marjorie Marchmont was twenty that Tyrrel appeared—Mr. Steven Tyrrel who up to that time had been improving his opportunities upon his father's fabulous estate upon one of the most fabulously wild and beautiful of the West India Islands. I use the term "fabulous" because the usual description of both estate and island sounded more like a bit of romance than any thing quite real and to be relied upon. But it was to be relied upon, nevertheless, and taking all things into consideration, Mr Steven Tyrrel was a fortunate favored young man as Marjorie Marchmont was a young woman. The whole Marchmont family were at grandmamma's seaside house when he first appeared among them. They had seen there about a week when he came with a letter of introduction from his mother, which the old lady in her own stately style had written and been a favorite with her, and on reading this letter and examining the bearer, the charming dignified old woman felt that her previous ill-election had not been in vain. This tall, slender young fellow, with his large dark eyes, with his romantic tropical style of beauty, with his graceful air and almost peculiarly novel grace of speech and manner, was at least in faultless physically as her young princess, and in the matter of birth and fortune she knew that the balance was as even one.

He remained with them, and proved a very pleasant addition to their circle. Naturally he began by admiring Marjorie. She was a pearl-skinned, dove-eyed beauty, and he had been very fond of women. He seemed to regard her with a gentle deferential wonder. In fact, there was about the young man a kind of grave simple humbly attractive in his way. He had not lived the ordinary society life of the generality of young men. He had not learned to be worldly. He had been something not unlike a prisoner in his far-away home, and a certain half-unconscious pleasure of following his own impulses were never ignoble ones. Sometimes they were whimsical, often they were very unlike the impulses of other people, and now and then they were a trifle astonishing to sober experienced persons, but they were never selfish or inclinable to ones. He had no small motives, no petty vanities; indeed, for so well-favored and lucky a young fellow, he was quite a wonder in his unconsciousness of himself and his numerous gifts.

"Is he a rajah, or a pasha, or the shah-in-shah himself, Miss Marjorie?" said a worldly-wise old friend of the family, after his first meeting with him. "What a gorgeous young potentate he is, to be sure, and how he throws the rest of us into the shade! Even that young hero, Malcolm, whose costumes and beauty are usually dazzling, pales beside him, and sinks into comparative insignificance. Does he wear a turban when he is at home, and a crooked cimeter blazing with diamonds, and has he shown a dignified desire to execute any of your orders yet when they have dared to be inattentive?"

"Grandmamma's waiters never are inattentive, Mr. Ruysland," said Miss Marjorie, with the prettiest possible but at the same time the most uncalled for, of blushes. Really, you know, there was no reason why she should color and thus evade the light satire of her old friend.

Mr. Sidney Ruysland was an old friend. He had known Marjorie Marchmont from her childhood, and had been very fond of her even in the days of her pinafores and primers, and so, perhaps for this reason, felt himself privileged to be fond of her now. He himself did not belong to the order respectable, and though he was rather a favorite of the elder Mrs. Marchmont's, she never regarded him as upon the aspirant list. He was very much older than Marjorie, being indeed, one of those old young men one occasionally meets in good society, and who are often exceedingly agreeable, because they have left the follies of youth in the background. He was rather tall, rather pale; his fine forehead was slightly bald. He had a soft voice and a good manner, and was prone to clever satire.

There was no commonplace envy in his feeling toward the new arrival; he might regard the youth and physical beauty and Fortunatus purse with some private wistfulness, but he was amiable ready to admire their possessor and congratulate him upon his good luck.

"Why should we depreciate Aladdin?" he said. "Let us rather admire him, since the genii have found him worthy to owt their magic lamp and the many good things accompanying its possession. In our secret heart we may wish that we also were lamp-owners; but since we are not—" And he shrugged his shoulders, and looked at Marjorie with a resigned smile.

As I have said, Mr. Steven Tyrrel followed the example of many less illustrious young men in falling in love with Marjorie. He showed his admiration in divers ways. He sang with her and danced with her; he obeyed all her gentle behests, and placed himself entirely at her service when they were together at any party of pleasure; he laid at her feet certain rich offerings, which he presented in his mother's name, and altogether he was on the verge of drifting pleasantly into a natural though not dangerous emotion, when there appeared on the scene of action the common place young woman whose name forms part of my ditty.

She came in autumn—Jane Rossitur—and she came unexpectedly: at least her arrival was an unexpected event to Steven Tyrrel; the rest seemed to take it quite as a matter of course. Returning by the shore one morning after taking his usual plunge in the sea, he came suddenly upon Jane Rossitur sitting on an upturned boat, her lap full of shells and sea-weed, and her hat lying on the sands at her feet. Almost immediately she heard him, and turned her head over her shoulder toward him, and then he saw what manner of young person she was, and his first mental exclamation was the following incongruous one:

"How unlike Marjorie Marchmont!" though perhaps it was not so incongruous after all, considering the fact that his mind had been wandering toward Marjorie as he strolled along. She was as unlike Marjorie Marchmont as day is unlike night, as winter is unlike summer, as—well, as unlike her as it is possible for two girls to be unlike each other. She was not a beauty at all, you would never have thought for an instant of calling her "pretty," and there were very few persons, and those only persons of sensitive and poetic temperament, who would have seen that she was what she was—a sweet, strange creature. She had a soft, clear, dark skin, a rare color, not a noticeable feature but her translucent green-gray eyes, and she was slight and odd and small. Just this was Jane Rossitur, and just this much Tyrrel saw in the moment that she lifted her face as he passed, and perhaps because the accidental encounter was a surprise, he quite took impressed itself upon him. It was odd that a young lady should be out and apparently enjoying herself so very early in the morning.

He certainly did not think of the possibility of her being a new arrival at the house and so when he saw her again she was a surprise to him once more. A visit to the neighboring town kept him out all day, and when he returned to the evening dinner was over, and the ladies were pouring tea in the drawing-room. Ruysland was there and two or three of his colleagues, and the first object that met Tyrrel's eyes as he walked into the room was the strange young woman sitting at a side table behind the tea-urn, and talking seriously to Mrs Marchmont. So very calm and composed was her air that she really looked as if she might have been pouring out tea in the same place every evening for the previous six months. She had done it before. It was evident, and expected to do it often enough again, and every body was used to seeing her to do it. Even Mrs Marchmont who was usually so punctilious seemed to forget at the moment that to Tyrrel at least she was a stranger.

"I dare say Mr. Tyrrel will take a cup of tea, Jane," she said.

Tyrrel felt his fit, feeling awkward enough but the cup of tea was poured out and handed to him with such undisturbed self-possession that he was set at ease almost immediately. He even recovered himself sufficiently to undertake a fresh examination of the girl. But he only saw what he had seen before—a dark soft skin, a rare color, and eyes with a actual tint of green in their clear gray. And as to her dress—well, to tell the truth, he recognized it as one of Marjorie's and saw that it had been furbished and trimmed to suit the more fragrantlight figure. I add that he quite wandered toward the waiter in consequence of the dress saving.

He made his way to Marjorie as early as possible and put his question to her very frankly. Who was the young lady who had poured out his tea—the strange young lady whom he had not met before, and to whom Mrs. Marchmont had forgotten to present him?

Marjorie opened her large pretty eyes in some surprise. A strange young lady! There are no strangers here. Oh dear! to be sure! How stupid and rude they must have appeared to him! She begged pardon. He must mean Jane Rossitur—there was nobody but Jane Rossitur, and somehow they were all so used to her that they felt as if every one who came to the house must know her as well as they did themselves. How annoyed grandmamma would be when she remembered her neglect.

Tyrrel held Marjorie's fan in his hand, and he opened, and shut it slowly.

"Nobody but Jane Rossitur," he repeated, half to himself. "I wonder how she likes being nobody but Jane Rossitur?"

A look of alarm fell upon Marjorie's fair face. She should not have could an unkind or slighting thing for the world; it would have cut her to her gentle, generous heart if it had ever occurred to her that she had been cruel to her poor relation, but the fact was that Jane Rossitur was not the individual to make an important personage of herself.

"Oh, please don't misunderstand me," she said, in genuine distress. "I do not think we are unkind to her. I am sure Jane herself knows that we do not mean to be. It was very careless of me to speak in that way, but you see, she is quite one of us. You must let me introduce you at once. You will like her very much. She is very nice indeed."

That was the beginning of it, and my task it is to show what the end was, and how oddly and humanly-mostly the elder Mrs. Marchmont's really well laid plans were upset. How it is that people are invariably inconsistent? that the best laid schemes of mice and men gang aft a-gley? How it is that the matches we regard as being made in heaven are so rarely consummated on earth? Flora, who was so plainly made for Browne, marries Sir Hector, the discomfiture of all her relatives, flones, who was born to make Amelia happy, elopes with Miss Robinson, who is neither so rich nor so beautiful; Adonis falls at the feet of a commonplace creature, whose rivals declare her to have no merit whatever; Aurelia, the dazzling and statuesque, surrenders her youth and beauty to little Carrots, who is (her lovers say) an odious, vulgar little dandy totally unworthy of her.

But to return to my story. In the plenitude of his good fortune and happiness Tyrrel was quite moved by the presence of a girl who was a poor relation, who poured out the tea for the visitors as if she was used to no other excitement, who was obliged to be grateful for Marjorie's castoff gowns, who was in fact, "nobody but Jane Rossitur." He heard all about her before that first evening come to a close. She was a very distant relation indeed—a fourth or fifth cousin, whose family was not even respectably well off. Her father was a dubious sort of individual, and her mother was a silly, characteless woman, whose half dozen daughters were none the fitter for her existence. Old Mrs. Marchmont, who had no patience with the stock, had educated Jane for a governess or companion, and during her holidays, or when she was out a-of situation, the girl came to her patroness and made herself as useful as possible. If there had been no Marjorie, it is not unlikely that her position might have been a different one, but the old lady's passion for the girl who was a beauty left the girl that was no a beauty rather out in the cold, though she was not by any means unkindly treated.

When Tyrrel came and took possession of her, Jane Rossitur accepted his attentions a little shyly at first. She was not used to such honor, and at the outset would almost rather have been left alone. But it would have been impossible that she should resist genuine friendliness. There was something winning in the young fellow's beauty, and the eagerness in his dark eyes touched her. She forgot her troubles and annoyances, and began to be happy. She laughed and talked and brightened, her oddly colored eyes sparkled, and she made a witty speech or so. Sidney Ruysland glanced across the room at her, and smiled.

"There are all sorts of possibilities in that girl, and Tyrrel is just the youngster to draw them out. Look at her eyes," he said to Marjorie.

Marjorie looked as she was bidden.

"They are very queer and big and bright," she said. "What color are they?"

"Olive-green, at present," was the answer. "And a rare tint it is." Eyes of that color have always that prim shape, too, and those long black lashes. I wonder how it is that nature so seldom bestows them upon a woman who is actually a beauty? Perhaps it is a merciful dispensation. It would be too much all at once."

"And they so very pretty, then?" asked Miss Marjorie, demurely. "I must tell Jane that you think so. "I do not believe she has ever been specially proud of them."

She was a beauty herself, you observe, but just at this moment she could not help wishing innocently that they had been olive-green instead.

After that night matters took a whimsical turn. Jane Rossitur was surprised to find that she had, always one companion. She did not find it easy to understand such a state of affairs either, being better used to that probably whole-some if natural neglect to which ordinary and portionless girls are usually fated when in the presence of those more fortunate. Instead of joining pretty Marjore's court, the enchanted palace contracted a habit of attaching himself to her own humble service. He took his tea standing near her side-table, he made her talk, he met her in her morning walks, he showed the gentlest possible consideration for her in every trifle.

"Indeed, if I was any body but Jane Rossitur, I should think he had fallen in love with me," she said to herself once, half-indignantly. In truth, her sentiments during the first four weeks of their acquaintance were of a rather undecided and mixed description. When he was with her, his deference, his sweet temper, his almost boyish way of appealing to her, his charm of manner, invariably softened her heart, and caused her to repent in her resolutions, but when she was alone, and thought the matter over sensibly, she felt a little irritated at times. Life had been such an easy matter to him, she told herself, that he was full of caprices, and his fancy for her was nothing but a caprice. He knew that he could turn from herself to Marjorie when the whim seized him, and so felt that he was amusing himself with her. Then again, perhaps his experience had something to do with it. He did not know that such a fancy would attract attention.

But she had not hit upon the truth at all. Caprice had nothing to do with the matter, unless it was the caprice of fate. The heart of the young man had simply been appealed to in a new way. Marjorie's rose and white and gold and brown had aroused in him an admiring wonder, but Jane Rossitur had touched a chord. She might be nobody but Jane Rossitur, but Jane Rossitur in her turned gown had an individuality of her own.

"I like to talk to her," said the prince to Ruysland. "I like to watch her. I never tired of her. Sometimes when her eyes shine so, and the color comes into her cheeks, as it does when she is pleased, I think I should like to take her little hand and kiss it."

Mr. Ruysland did not looking all displeased or shocked, though he was a fastidious gentleman enough. He smiled with a placidity which might almost have been interpreted into approval of his companion's enthusiasm.

Collections are made morning and evening in season for important mails—the down town boxes often and the up town boxes thirty minutes before closing mails at the office.

Holidays and Sundays the Carriers will low will attend for the delivery of letters from 8½ to 9 A. M.
